timber species definitions

Material	Origin	Colour	Technical
PINE	Produced from pine species that is grown in sustainably managed forest plantations. It is classified as a soft wood timber, which is easy to drill, nail and glue. Density of Pine material can vary greatly.	Cream to light straw in colour with a fine but slightly uneven texture. Ideal for painting.	FJ Pine: Architrave and mouldings manufactured using Finger Jointed pine are for painting only. A finger joint is when an end joint has wedge shaped projections in one piece of timber, and fit matching recesses on the other piece of timber and is banded together by an adhesive.
MDF	Medium Density Fibreboard is an engineered timber product formed by the breaking down of softwood and woodchips into wood fibres similar to cotton wool, combining it with a wax and resin binder. Panels are then formed by applying high temperature and pressure. The panels have smooth surfaces on both sides and have an even density profile throughout which makes an ideal substrate to router, groove and profile.	Yellow to brown in colour with a smooth texture. Ideal for painting.	Primed MDF: The MDF architrave is coated with a primer sealant to make painting easier and help achieve a smooth finish.
MERANTI	Meranti is classified as a light hardwood which is a versatile timber widely used for decorative applications including furniture, interior finishing, panelling, door jambs, mouldings, skirting and architrave. Meranti is sourced sustainably from forests in South East Asia.	Light pink to light brown some variants can display a greyish tinge.	Meranti: Usually used for staining applications however Meranti paints very well with little to no tannins.
